In addition, the number of Club Paris 2024 members has exceeded four million, proof of the support of sports enthusiasts who want to be part of the Olympic adventure. This mobilization also materialized on the commercial level. Paris 2024 reported successful ticket sales, with almost seven million tickets sold to date. PARIS 2024 AIMS TO BE INCLUSIVE SUSTAINABLE AND VALUING HERITAGE

Sustainability and legacy were among the other key topics discussed at this week's meeting. Paris 2024's efforts in these two areas are already making a positive contribution to French society ahead of the Games. For example, more than one million children took part in the Olympic and Paralympic Week organized this year in France. The promotion of sports practice, in particular through the initiative to offer 30 minutes of daily physical activity in all French schools, was also presented, underlining the ambition of Paris 2024 to leave a legacy for the next generation. The Paris team also explained that the "Impact 2024" endowment fund, which harnesses the power of sport to have a social impact, has supported more than 1,000 projects so far, benefiting more than 3.1 millions of people. The positive effects on local authorities are reflected in the significant proportion of contracts awarded by the organizing committee to small and medium-sized enterprises, ie 75%. As far as sustainability is concerned, Paris 2024 gave some examples of long-term carbon reduction, including ensuring access to the electricity grid for all sites and moving away from traditional diesel-based power generation, commonly used in stadiums. This is another example of the power of the Games to change practices and align the efforts of the Organizing Committee, local stakeholders, sponsors and broadcasters.
